In this article we review the concept and a vast amount of empirical research on salutogenesis: core literature from the past 2 decades. We emphasize the concept's developmental context, the main theoretical contributions to it, its developments, and the ways of assessing and developing salutogenic interventions. We conclude that a great variety of health promoting resources, including knowledge, social and personal resources, and participation, have been associated with increased salutogenic coping potential. The most consistent and strong predictor of greater coping potential is the presence of socially supportive and supportive social networks. Interventions focused on increasing these are most likely to promote greater coping potential. We present some suggestions for future development of the concept of salutogenesis.Wednesday, January 16, 2011 I've been tagged by Lisa at Moonstruck with the tradition of Random Question Tuesday. Each person has to answer ten questions, and then the person who tagged has to answer a set of ten questions with the same tagger. So, if you want to play along at home, please visit the Moonstruck blog and do the same. It's a fun way to learn a little bit more about your friends and other bloggers. Here is my list: If you were a greeting card, what would your first line read? It started out as a story, but it isn't finished and then ended up being a paragraph here and there. What made you pursue blogging? I'm one of those people who doesn't do what I want to do, I do what I am expected to do. And I was expected to do this. Or at least, that was the plan. I mean, I'm not getting paid or anything, it's just the way it was going to happen. I started out in the Chat Room. Then the Chat Room became the blog. I found the people I met there pretty interesting, and I started to enjoy myself when people started to respond to my posts. I kept with it a little longer because I liked doing it and it was a good way to pass time when I should have been working on my thesis, but I started to feel like I wasn't doing it for myself anymore.
